writes of the death of Dutrou-Bornier as follows: 'This version, circulated for the benefit of foreigners, hides a tragedy. The exasperated population had responded to violence with more violence; the islanders had killed the foreigner by stabbing him with his own bayonette." In a footnote, Mouly adds, "According to Father Bienvenido, a man called Papiano appears to have protected the two little daughters of Dutrou-Bornier from the wrath of his compatriots by hiding them in his oven."

3 Who brought rabbits to the island is unknown, but they were apparently eaten to extinction before they could multiply.

4 Vaihu?

5 From the description and general location, this must be Akahanga.

6 Sebastian Englert's Idioma Rapanui states that "pakeopá: no era nombre genérico por moai, ni de cierto tipo de moai, como creen algunos autores, sino nombre propio de un moai de piedra que fue llevado de la isla y que en el dorso tenia varias figuras (tres rona y dos ua). Actualment dan, en general, el nombre de pakaopa a estatuillas de madera o piedra, adornadas con figuras en el dorso" (page 218). The word does not appear in the Rapanui dictionary by Jordi Fuentes. From the way the word is used by Pinart, he is describing ahu. This could be a misunderstanding; he may have pointed to an ahu and asked what it was, and his informant thought he meant a statue.

7 The heading of the printed text from which this translation was made indicates that the text was not edited. The cited dimensions of the pakaopa would have benefited from the attention of an editor with access to the actual dimensions, as recorded by Pinart. The dimensions given are not possible.

8 The description suggests this may be the ahu at Akahanga with its red scoria facings that contain petroglyphs, although the actual designs do not resemble the drawings made by Pinart (see Lee 1992: Figure 4.130). Later, Pinart states this site "might be about ten km" from Vaihu, but anyone walking this rocky coast might be forgiven for overestimating the distance. Pinart's map as shown in Chauvet (Figure 4) shows "Opulu" at about the position of Akahanga ("Opulu" was hand-written on the map).

9 The differences noted by Pinart were due to weathering of the stone.

10 The term used by Pinart is "gaulé" and appears to refer to tapa cloth. Gauler means to beat (trees) with a long pole. As the islanders beat the mahute bark (with a wood beater) to make a tapa, Pinart likely used this term to describe a garment made of barkcloth, "in the Tahitian manner".

11 Rongorongo is a pictographic form of writing on small wood tablets. It is unique in the Pacific.

12 Sophora toromiro, now extinct on the island. See Zizka 1993.

13 The male figures are called moai kavakava; the female are moai pa'a pa'a. See Kurze 1997.

14 This ornament, worn around the neck is known as "rei-miro". Crescent-shaped pendants are known throughout the Pacific and were status symbols.

15 Puna Pau, the topknot quarry.

16 The lake at Rano Kau has matted vegetation on its surface, giving the appearance of "ponds".

17 The needle-shaped islet is Motu Kao Kao; Motu Nui is the largest in the group of three islets off the southwest coast of the island.

Appendix

The following chart lists known ship arrivals to Easter Island from 1722-1879. This clearly shows that Rapa Nui was not so isolated in historic times as might be imagined. Where the information is available, we have indicated which were whalers, but many more probably were in that category also. While few ships spent much time on the island, there was trading going on, and contact with the islanders was occurring, at various levels. Many ships "sighted" the island but either chose not to land, or were unable to land due to high surf or hostile gestures from the Rapanui. We chose to stop the list at 1879 when there is one last mention of Roussel returning to the island. Our thanks to Grant McCall for permission to use this portion of his publication.
